

ABSTRACT

5 An array device for detection of targets has a plurality of detection zones containing different detection spots in a predetermined pattern, such as edge effects. The detection spots are randomized to reduce inaccuracies resulting from spatial effects. Preferably, no two detection zones have the same pre-determined pattern. The device can be provided with a readable code to allow a detector to determine the predetermined pattern used for the array.